Lawrence Dunbar Reddick (1910-1995) was a historian and writer who documented the United States Civil Rights Movement and was a pioneer in the field of African American studies. Born and raised in Jacksonville, Florida, Reddick attended Fisk University where he studied history under Charles S. Johnson, E. Franklin Frazier, and Horace Mann Bond. He earned his Ph.D. in history at the University of Chicago, writing a dissertation on "The Negro in the New Orleans Press, 1850-1860: A Study in Attitudes and Propaganda." In 1938 he married Ella Ruth Thomas, a New Orleans native, social worker, and teacher whom Reddick met while they were both pursuing graduate work at the University of Chicago.

During the 1930s, Reddick taught at Kentucky State College and Dillard University, and headed a Federal Emergency Relief Agency (FERA) project to collect slave narratives (which later continued under the auspices of the WPA Federal Writers Project). After the death of Arthur (Arturo) Schomburg in 1938, Reddick became the second curator of the Schomburg Collection at the New York Public Library (NYPL). During World War II, he spearheaded a project to gather letters and other materials from Black soldiers to document their experiences in the war. While in New York during the 1940s, he also lectured at City College and the New School. In 1948, Reddick resigned from his position at NYPL following a dispute with the Library over what Reddick felt was a lack of funds necessary to properly oversee the Schomburg Collection. He then served as a history professor and chief librarian at Atlanta University, a position he held from 1948-1955; he then moved to Alabama State College, where he became chairman of the history department.

In the mid-1950s, while teaching at Alabama State College, Reddick became involved with the Montgomery bus boycott, and chronicled events of the protest for Dissent magazine. During this time, Reddick met and befriended Martin Luther King, Jr., then pastor at Dexter Avenue Church and president of the Montgomery Improvement Association. In 1959, Reddick wrote the first biography of King, Crusader Without Violence. That same year, he accompanied Martin Luther and Coretta Scott King on a month-long trip to India to meet with Indian officials and Gandhian activists. In 1964, Reddick again joined King on the trip to Oslo, Norway, when he received the Nobel Peace Prize. Reddick also became involved in the Southern Christian Leadership Council, serving on the board and various committees from its formation through the 1980s. Reddick saw his role as the official historian of the Civil Rights Movement, and in that capacity collected materials, conducted interviews, and took copious notes, in addition to his published writings on the topic.

Due to his participation in the Civil Rights Movement, Reddick was fired from his position at Alabama State College in 1960 at the request of Governor John Patterson, who accused him of being a Communist sympathizer. He found a position at Coppin State College in Baltimore, Maryland, where he taught for seven years. During this time, Reddick was involved with Project Y-003: To Improve Teachers for Inner-City Schools. The project aimed to educate and train teachers to work with students with culturally disadvantaged backgrounds in the Baltimore Public School system. Reddick's findings were ultimately published as a report to the United States Office of Education in 1967, and included a proposal to adopt the program nationally.

After working in Baltimore, Reddick took a break from academia to serve as director of the Opportunities Industrialization Center (OIC) Institute, a Philadelphia-based adult education and job training program started by Leon Sullivan. In 1967, Reddick began teaching at Temple University in Philadelphia, soon joining the newly-created Afro-Asian Institute to teach classes in Black history. Reddick's time at Temple was marked by turbulence, and he often clashed with the history department and university administration. In 1976, Reddick authored a report alleging discriminatory hiring practices at Temple, leading to the formation of two investigatory committees.
Throughout his academic career, Reddick continued to expand the field of Black history, giving frequent lectures at academic conferences and participating on numerous committees devoted to developing African-American studies curricula and advocating for the inclusion of Black history in academia and cultural institutions. In the early 1970s, he joined the Kinte Library Project, an effort spearheaded by Alex Haley to study Black genealogy through archival research and oral history, producing a book-length report on the "Search for the Black Family in America." From 1977-1978, Reddick taught at Harvard as a visiting professor of African-American studies; while there, he embarked on a research project to study the institution's history of Black students and faculty. A few years later, in the early 1980s, he received a National Endowment for the Humanities grant to study the history of Historically Black Colleges and Universities.

In 1978, Reddick moved to New Orleans to take a position as professor of African American history at Dillard University, which he held until his retirement in 1987. He remained in New Orleans until his death on August 2, 1995.

Scope and Content Note

The Lawrence D. Reddick Photograph collection, dating from the 1900s to 1983, contains photographs and negatives that chronicle Reddick's academic work, research, work on Martin Luther King Jr.'s biography, involvement in the American Civil Rights Movement, and his personal life. The collection is arranged into Personal photographs; Professional photographs; images of civil rights activities; and images used in Reddick's writing projects.

Several personal photographs are present, including headshots of Reddick, snapshots of his family, images of a 1968 trip to Hawaii, and other assorted family pictures.

The photographs in the Professional grouping primarily cover Reddick's academic career, including graduation photographs, some images of his tenure as curator of the Schomburg Collection (now Schomburg Center) at the New York Public Library, Project Y-003: To Improve Teachers for Inner-City Schools, and his time teaching at Atlanta and Temple Universities. Reddick assembled several subject files related to his academic interests. These files include press photographs and other commercially available images of Black students and educational environments.

Reddick collected pictures of Black people in professional and occupational roles, especially the Black experience in the United States military. Reddick also assembled several press photographs of the Second Italo-Ethiopian War. There are many photographs of the activities of the Opportunities Industrialization Center, including meetings and presentations of their work to different communities. Lastly, pictures of various members of Phi Beta Sigma, a fraternity of which Reddick was a member, are present in the collection.

In the Civil Rights and Political Activities grouping, there are images of Reddick traveling with Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King on their trip to India in 1959, and Oslo, Norway in 1968 where King accepted the Nobel Peace Prize.

The Writings grouping contains photographs used for research and illustrations of Reddick's book projects, including Crusader Without Violence: A Biography of Martin Luther King Jr., and two unpublished biographies about civil rights leaders Ralph Abernathy and Leon Sullivan.
